Some folks believe that the brain is primarily responsible for all language processing. The first type of the opinion of music processing is known as synchronistic soundtolanguage version. This model says that language is transmitted via the ear and should we understand a language it is possible to understand the significance of the noise. The second view is that noises are actually noise. We then say that sounds are notsound since they are in reality a noise. This may be viewed from hearing a word fornoise likebuzzing. Noise doesnt have meaning. It is simply noise. The third opinion is that the brain has an audiosound processing mechanism. This view says that all sounds can be interpreted to mean something. The fourth view of music processing is that the brain is not in control of whats being played. It only knows how to perceive things. Someone may have the ability to hear and interpret sounds but the mind cant actually perceive anything, whatsjust seem. This opinion says that our brain only perceives those items that are purposeful. Music therapy is often practiced where the individual is played simple or complex pieces of music by an ear, or a trained musician who also aids the patient. This also helps the individual to adapt to the audio and also to locate the inherent meaning. By altering the sounds, the individual will learn to identify different meanings and thus have the ability to speak about and understand their experiences. Each of these views is valid somehow. When we learn a new piece of music that the brain instantly adds fresh connections in the new information to regions in the brain associated with sound processing. Due to the sheer complexity of music processing in the brain there is no one answer to this question, wheres music processed in the mind.
